Early days of telephone in Appomattox recalled

running. They accepted.

Telephones were getting more popular every day and more and more people were able to afford a phone. This growth necessitated a larger office. The business was moved across the railroad tracks on the upper floor of a store building and was run by Haywood and Hancock.

On April 1, 1920 Herbert Pulliam came back to his native Appomattox after a five-year absence. He had spent two years in the U.S. Army during World War I, and three years as a civil service employee in Washington. He had lunch that day with S.L. Ferguson at his home Courtland.

During the luncheon, Ferguson casually asked Pulliam if he would like to buy a telephone company. It was to be sold that very afternoon at 1:30 in front of the Court House. Pulliam assured Ferguson that he had no way of financing such a deal, but Ferguson had that arranged in a hurry and in less than an hour Pulliam was the owner of the telephone company.

Pulliam owned and operated the company until 1946 when he sold it to K.E. Schuler and W.S. Gills; some time later Schuler and Gills sold the company to First Colony Telephone Company.

And, what was Earman doing all this time? He had other irons in the fire. Next week we'll hear about his next endeavor and what it meant to Appomattox.
